At a point in the not-too-distant future, world resources are so depleted, and populations so great, that certain countries must ‘reduce the population’ to assist and cease resource drain. Several countries have been deemed ‘salvageable’, as long as populations can be thinned. Australia launches a new policy whereby all citizens must prove their legitimacy as an Australian to remain, rather than be ‘relocated’. A panel is set up and citizens are brought before this panel to state their claim that they qualify as an Australian and granted citizenship. The pressing questions now exists – What qualifies an ‘Australian’?
