SYDNEY METRO TO OPEN IN THREE WEEKS

Australia's biggest public transport project, the North West Metro, will open to customers on Sunday 26 May, delivering a turn up and go rail service from Rouse Hill to Chatswood.

Premier Gladys Berejiklian and Minister for Transport Andrew Constance today confirmed the opening date of the new Metro line, which is now undergoing final commissioning.

"This is an exciting time for the future of public transport. Thousands of commuters will have access to world class metro rail," Ms Berejiklian said.

"We have delivered the North West Metro on time and more than $1 billion under budget.

"This project is the result of hard work, discipline and focus. I want to thank all those involved in delivering this important project."

Mr Constance said the Metro North WestLine includes 13 stations between Tallawong and Chatswood and 4000 commuter car parking spaces.

"The new generation of driverless trains have now completed more than 180,000 kilometres of testing and final commissioning is underway," Mr Constance said.

"Sydney Metro is Australia's first fully accessible railway which will deliver fast, safe and reliable travel.

"The Metro line is currently being extended from Chatswood to Bankstown and by 2024 Sydney will have 31 metro stations and a 66 kilometre standalone metro railway."

At full operation, trains will run every four minutes in each direction at peak times on the Metro North West Line, with the ability to run up to every two minutes in the future.
