If your favourite school subject is P.E but you're not sure what kind of career you want, a great place to start is the Physical Education Career Target. It features 64 occupations across different skill levels to help start your exploration.

Would you like a career in sport? Then get curious about these careers! Click the job titles to learn more about the job, find out if you have the personal requirements, and to find VET and higher education courses to help get you there.

Sports Administrator: Manage clubs, promote their sport, obtain corporate sponsorship and refine the rules and structure of the game.

Sports Coach: Teach individuals and teams how to improve the way they play by analysing their performances, instructing them in skills, and providing motivation.

Sports Development Officer: Promote sports and coordinate the participation of people in sport, including special interest groups.

Are You an Elite Athlete?

Many universities understand the challenge of balancing high-level sporting commitments with academics, so offer Elite Athlete Programs (EAP) to help you thrive academically and athletically.

An elite athlete is typically someone who competes at a representative, state, or national level, but each institution has its own definition and criteria you must meet.

Benefits of Elite Athlete Programs may include:

- Flexible study options like tailored workloads, alternative exams, and assessment deadlines.
- Access to specialised academic advice, timetabling assistance, and study planning.
- Scholarships, travel grants, and discounts.
- Gym memberships, sports psychology services, and nutrition advice.
- Workshops and networking opportunities to build your career both in and out of sports.

If you don't want to sacrifice your sports for your studies, applying for an EAP can be a game-changer. Investigate the EAPs on offer at the institutions that interest you before submitting your university course preferences.

Do you play sport? Do you think it's useful for school study and your career?

The Year13 Play On Youth Sports Initiative survey found that of the young people who play sport the majority believe it benefits their studies because it helps:

- clear their mind,
- lift their mood,
- give them energy,
- improve their productivity, and
- get better sleep.

Interestingly though, only some thought sports helped with their careers, even though they identified it as developing teamwork, resilience, collaboration, discipline, and leadership - all skills high up on employers' most wanted lists!

Playing sport has many benefits and helps build transferable skills. So if you've dropped sport to focus on study, it's time to think again - you can connect sports to helping you reach your study and career goals!

Click over to PlayOn to learn more about how sports benefit your life and your career.
